In dairy cows, iO Maize it can support high milk yields because of its high starch content. Providing adequate amounts of starch also promotes rumen bacterial growth, thus enhancing forage digestibility, rumen cycling and subsequent feed intakes.

Part of our Premium Grains Range – thoroughly cleaned and locally sourced Maize. Less dust, less wastage and more nutrition!

Active Constituent: Energy density (MJ ME/kg DM) – 13.5 (12-16). Starch Content – 70-75%. Slow fermentation. Crude Protein – 9.5%.

Quick Facts & Benefits: Maize grain is higher in energy density and starch content, and has a slower rate of rumen fermentation.
Maize may be useful as a complementary grain to wheat: When grain is fed at high levels per cow per day, When cows are freshly calved, When cows are at increased risk of ruminal acidosis, and In hot weather.

In fact, animals have a more defined appetite for salt than any other element besides water.

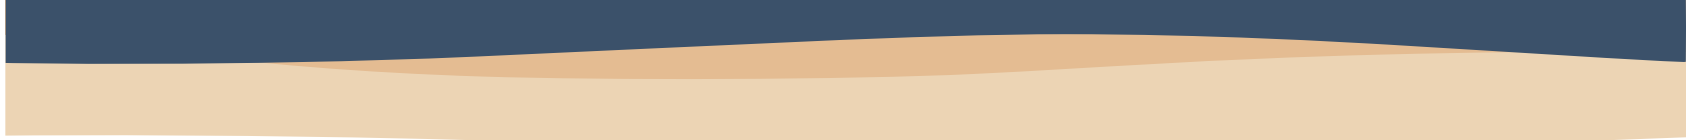

However, most plants do not provide enough sodium for animal feeding. They may also lack adequate chloride. Therefore, salt supplementation is used to help keep livestock and poultry feed nutritionally balanced.

In addition to this, due to an animal's natural taste for it, salt can be used to deliver less palatable nutrients and can also act as a feed limiter. Can also be used in pools.

Their high protein content makes them a valuable resource for monogastric and ruminant production systems as they are cost competitive with a wide range of other protein sources.
Part of our Premium Grains Range – thoroughly cleaned and locally sourced Lupins. Less dust, less wastage and more nutrition!

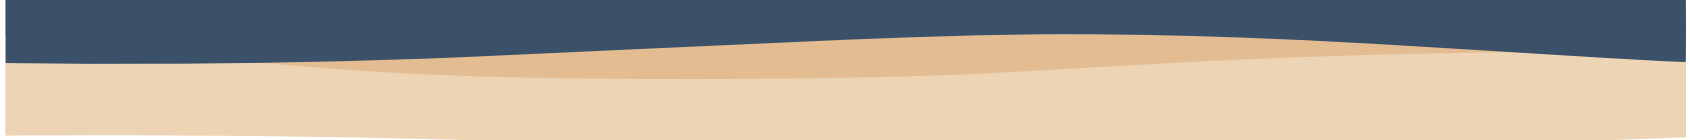

Active Constituent: Approx: 90% Dry Matter, 30% Crude Protein, 13% Metabolisable Energy (Mj/kg DM)

Quick Facts & Benefits: Ruminant animals can readily digest all components of narrow leafed lupin grain, as resident microbial populations provide the enzymes required to degrade the soluble and insoluble complex carbohydrates.
A big advantage of lupin grain is that ruminants typically do not require an introduction period to avoid the potential problem of acidosis. This is due to its low starch level and relatively high digestible crude fibre content.
Lupin grains are also large, highly palatable and easy to broadcast into thick cereal stubbles.
